

"The Truth Behind" – A Demon Game

Main Character

Demon Glasya, she works for the Devil as an angel assassin.

Game System

The game is an Action RPG. Consists of linear maps with hidden secrets and a linear story. There are going to be enemies around the map which if killed they give EXP to the character, when this EXP reaches a limit the character levels up, until it gets to level 100. Each level gives an increase in a different stat, them being strength, defense or magic.

Starting Weapon

Double Dagger, made of Red Hell's Iron, a type of divine metal that can harm only angels.

Other Weapons

Michael's Flaming Sword, a heavy sword that can be acquired after killing Michael, its abilities are hell's and heaven's flames (Unlocked for New Game+).
Demonic or Angelic Weapons(To be decided if they will be added or not to the game).

Way of Evolving

New abilities are acquired according to the powers and ways of each defeated and absorbed archangel. Level System based on XP acquired from killing enemies, the more levels you have the harder it is to evolve. The level cap is level 100.

Types of Angels

Guardian Angels: Weaker and with basic weapons, like swords and spears, do not use magic;

Principalities: Medium strength angels, stronger than guardian angels, all use shield and basic weapons, some of the stronger among them use magic;

Archangels: Weapons and abilities depend on their representations, history, magical and physical strength.

Types of Demons

Low Rank Demons: Weaker and with basic weapons, like swords and spears, do not use magic;

Medium Rank Demons: Medium strength angels, stronger than guardian angels, all use shield and basic weapons, some of the stronger among them use magic;

ArchDemons: Weapons and abilities depend on their representations, history, magical and physical strength.

How to get to each Archangel

When ordered by the Devil, the demon will be sent to a historical city of time to fight an army that depends on the influence of each Archangel. The Angel will be somewhere in the city where he observes the battles, you can see him in the sky and go to him to start the fight.

Archangels

Jeliel: First Boss. Weak Angel. He has the ability of using light magic and controls white doves that in the fight will be red to demonstrate the demon illusion that affects how he sees the Peace symbol.

Cassiel: Weaker Superior Angel. Second boss for underestimating the demon's power and going to fight the demon's plans to destroy a city, he was there thanks to his good prediction skills but it is not that strong. He doesn't give any skills after dying, but when he dies, there will be a prediction of an alternate future where all angels die, and the world is destroyed by demons.

Israfil: Third Boss. Uses a horn for magic and a spear to attack, his combo is based on using a paralyzing magic sound and then attacking using the spear. He resembles a bard. One of the paralysis spells is the ray of the horn, which consists of 4 rays, one in each direction and if hit, it paralyzes.

Raphael: Great healing power. The first time he reaches half-life, he heals completely, but cannot use this ability again. He uses a scepter and focuses on barrier spells and some light spells, but can use his staff as a Saber.

Belphegor: Highest rank Demon, King of The First Circle and the sin of sloth. We fight during daydreams, he perceives the inner conflict between the holy and the demonic and attacks. He is a tall, fat, and bearded ex-archangel, so he's very strong and can become a huge wolf during the fight. He wields a huge black club, and uses fire magic which is quite strong.

Azrael: Angel of Death. Like Abaddon, he is also a fallen one, but after discovering part of the truth, we fight him, he uses the Blade of Death, an item created by him to kill angels. His wings are smaller and extremely dark. Once he gets to 10% of his life he activates his secret weapon, the Death Scythe, a weapon that has slower attacks that can kill with one hit. After dying, we fuse our daggers to the Blade of Death and increase its damage forever.

Metatron: Because he is a scribe of God, he focuses on written spells and barriers. He is very strong, and in cases of proximity, the feather he uses for spells can be used as a dagger. He doesn't give any skills when killed, but he will die in Bethlehem, so Jesus will be there, and Metatron will show Glasya the hope Jesus will bring.

Salatiel: Relatively strong. Full base on light magic and debuffs on the demon for using a spell opposite to him. On prayers while fighting, he can use knockback magic every 20 seconds to avoid hand to hand combat.

Abaddon: Fallen angel of destruction. During a daydream, while flying around the world, Glasya finds and fights Abaddon over a volcano in Pompeii. In the fight, they activate the volcano that destroys the city. Abaddon uses his fists to fight, imbued with void magic that can attract or repel Glasya.

Gabriel: One of the strongest angels. He uses a golden clarinet, sounding and writing magic. The Clarinet can be used as a rapier that does not deal a lot of damage but has a high attack speed. As one of the strongest archangels, when dealing $\frac{3}{4}$ of damage in his life, he uses an area sound spell that, when hit, Glasya loses $\frac{3}{4}$ of his health and can't heal for 10 seconds.

Uriel: Uses a fire sword and fire spells from a book. He is quite strong, when he reaches $\frac{1}{4}$ health, explodes in fire and releases a fire aura that can be expanded periodically.

Michael: Ultimate Boss. He will use the Flaming Sword, made out of the tree of life branches, and shield of Justice and his army is the strongest because of his influence. After he reaches 1/2 of his life his is going to active the secret skill only he can use with the Flaming Sword, the sword will take the shape of the tree of life and Michael will attach to it and control the tree attacking with its roots and leaves, as well as using fire magic to attack. After dying, Michael's powers take out the Devil's mind control.

Shadow Slash: A slash that will drop a mid-range Black Dagger slash. Acquired after killing Salatiel.

Health Increase: Increases in 1 the quantity of heals that Glasya has. Acquired after killing Raphael.

Web Blade: A high speed attack skill that when used, Glasya attacks in multiple directions at the same time. Acquired after killing Gabriel.

Void Enchant: It is possible to imbue void magic in the daggers to increase the damage dealt for 7 seconds. Acquired after killing Abbadon.

Fire Ball: Long range magic spell. Acquired after killing Uriel.

Skills Arrangement

The Skills will be used with shortcuts and can be attached to the buttons the player wants, and as the buttons are limited, the player can choose which skills will be equipped in each fight.

Reasons Why Glasya Does Not Stop Fighting Angels

Due to the mind control of the Devil, she cannot stop fighting angels even if she tries, she will only be able to stop being controlled after killing Michael. Glasya fights Abbadon and Azrael due to the thoughts of regret, to try to pay for her sins by killing fallen angels that destroy as much as the demons. Glasya fights Belfegor to survive, because Belfegor attacks Glasya after seeing the conflict in power, so they fight and Glasya kills Belfegor. Glasya attempts to trick the Devil by saying that Gabriel killed Belfegor. 2 centuries in Earth-time is equal to a single month in Hell-time.

Base Story

It all started when Lucifer was expelled from heaven and created hell to live and eventually get his revenge. Then, to fight God's army, made up of angels of different classes, he created his own army and named them demons. Among the created demons, he developed some stronger and some with more unique skills for certain jobs. One of them is Glasya, a demon made to kill angels quickly and in large numbers. But after centuries working for the Devil, this demon was assigned to hunt archangels, the highest class type of angels who work directly for God, but little did everyone know that by killing these archangels, she would absorb their auras and part of their powers, which began to conflict with the demon's powers and thus begin to alter the Demon's vision. This vision change occurs both in the way she sees the angels' features and shapes, in addition to changing the way she sees how humans looked at her, going from admiring looks to despising ones, and also changes in her own features from being a beautiful and elegant to a more frightening and intimidating being, with horns and sharp teeth.

After killing Michael she ends up discovering that the Devil put a very powerful illusory spell on her, which makes her see angels as monsters and demons as beings of good. By killing angels, God's guard loses more and more strength, enabling the Devil's revenge. and revealing the rest of the truth, and learning her true nature of destruction and hatred. Glasya once again with revenge and hate in her eyes gets the Flaming Sword, made of the tree of life from Michael's remains and resonates with it, just like she is an angelic and demonic being. Before leaving the arena there are vines around it that were generated by Michael using the power of the tree of life, the vines blocking the fire can be burnt by the flaming sword hell's flames. After destroying the vines Glasya advances to a battlefield where by the end there is her way back to hell to have her revenge back, in this battlefield there are principalities and high ranked demons where she will learn how to use the dual power of the Flaming Sword, with both the hell flames that damage only angels and the heavens flames that damage only demons.

After discovering that her whole life was a lie and that the Devil who looked like the hero was actually the great villain all along, Glasya goes after the Devil to kill him, so that later she can kill herself and pay for all her sins. As Glasya confronts Devil about the spell, she refuses to continue working as an angel killer, they start fighting, the fight progresses normally, but after Glasya finishes off the Devil's life bar, the Devil will heal himself, and reveal why he did it all. The Devil argues that there's no point in trying to kill him, because as all natural things, there's a need for balance between light and dark. So as well as God he cannot die. All he wanted was to kill angels as a way of hurting God's ego by killing his "perfect" creatures, and used Glasya just as a tool to do it. After the plan is revealed, Glasya, with all her demonic and holy energies already colliding, collapses and vanishes in the air, leaving only her daggers and an unpleasant memory in the world of her murderous acts, even if those were not her intentions.

Full Story

Chapter 0: Prelude

It all started when Lucifer was expelled from heaven and created hell to live and eventually get his revenge. Then, to fight God's army, made up of three different angel classes Guardian Angels, Principalities and Archangels. For that fight he created his own army and named them demons. Among the created demons, there are also three different classes, Low-Ranked Demons the weakest and most basic type of angels, Medium-Ranked Demons with focus on Magic, Strength or Speed. He also developed some stronger and some with more unique skills for certain jobs, called Arch-Demons.

One of them is Glasya, a demon made to kill angels quickly and in large numbers. But after centuries working for the Devil, as a Guardian Angel Hunter she was assigned to hunt archangels, the highest class type of angels who work directly for God.

Chapter 1: Jericho

Her first task to kill an angel is assigned by The Devil in 9000 Before Christ, at Jericho the first city to ever exist. There, Jeliel watches over the city with his army. The army is neither big nor particularly strong; archangels always underestimate the actual power of demons, as they are never seen as a true threat.

Glasya, with a small army of Low-Ranked demons, arrives at Jericho, where a fight for the city begins. Glasya slashes through the Guardian Angels like they are paper—her advance is smooth and deadly. After destroying a few hundred Guardian Angels, she reaches Jeliel.

Their fight is very balanced. Jeliel uses his light powers as well as his red doves—which in the future would be called symbols of Peace—to try and stop Glasya. Even though he unleashes his powers to their maximum, Jeliel is not strong enough. Glasya, with her unique battle style, called The Dance of a Demon by the Angels, kills Jeliel by ripping his head off.

The battle is over, but Jeliel's body starts to vanish into white particles, and for some reason, these particles approach Glasya and get absorbed by her. She tries to outrun them as if they are some kind of attack, but that does not work. As she finishes absorbing them, a flash of the fight pops into her mind: the red doves are white, and the angel's wings are not featherless and dark—they are white and full of beautiful feathers, blessed and gracious. Glasya is a bit startled after having that vision, but she does not give it much thought, assuming it is a trick by the angels to confuse her.

After killing Jeliel, Glasya does not receive another archangel-killing task for almost eight centuries. She uses that time to train and perfect her fighting style, as well as to learn new tricks. But time passes differently in Hell, so she spends only four months there without any missions. During that time, she practices her control over the shadows—an art that very few Archdemons can master. It takes her a long time to learn how to shape and control it. For now, she only perfects the power to create a Shadow Prison, binding enemies in place for a short period of time.

Chapter 2: Akrotiri

74 centuries pass on Earth—only 6 months in Hell, time passes differently in Hell there is not really a pattern to time passing in Hell it just passes—before Glasya receives another task. In that time, she hones her fighting style and deepens her mastery over shadows, perfecting the Shadow Prison, a technique that binds her enemies in place. Few Archdemons can shape darkness with such precision.

Her next mission takes her to Akrotiri, 1600 BC, a city under demonic control. The demons there are orchestrating the great Minoan eruption, using it as a weapon. But the angels have caught wind of their plans. Cassiel, an archangel with the rare gift of prediction, leads their forces. He is neither feared nor greatly respected among his kind, and so his army is small—mostly Guardian Angels, with only a handful of Principalities.

The battle unfolds on the surrounds of the volcano, ash already thick in the air. Glasya carves through the enemy ranks as if clearing a path through underbrush, her movements precise and unhurried. She climbs steadily toward the volcano's summit, where Cassiel stands, directing the defense, waiting for her.

Their duel begins with Cassiel evading her blows using his foresight to predict her strikes just moments before they land. But his skill cannot keep pace with her relentless advance. Step by step, she forces him back until her blade finds its mark, his flesh. The battle flows like a deadly dance, each single attack is a demanding precision, speed and power from both sides.

Cassiel dodges were each time getting more and more risky as if the angel was getting tired and more damaged, and that was exactly what it was. The few attacks Cassiel was not able to dodge were too big of a burden to the angel, and that was fatal, as the battle progressed Glasya kept pushing through and after multiple slashes and stabs, Cassiel finally gave in to the damages.

As Cassiel falls, his form begins to dissolve into radiant fragments—just as Jeliel’s had before. The particles rush toward Glasya. She tries to dodge, but they follow, seeping into her. Then a vision strikes.

She sees a world in ruin—cities aflame, streets littered with the dead. In the skies, monstrous winged beings circle, resembling angels yet they all gave a different feeling. At the center of it all stands a man she knows: the Devil. But he is not the Devil she serves—no gleaming white feathers, no beauty—only black, tattered, featherless wings, horns and burnt skin.

The vision fades. Cassiel is gone, as though he had never been there. Glasya stands on the scorched rock, the echo of what she saw gnawing at her thoughts. If that truly was the Devil, then the monstrous creatures must have been demons—but nothing like the soldiers she knows. They were red, deformed, savage.

Doubt creeps in. She has always believed she fought to protect humanity from the angels. So why, in this possible future, is the world destroyed by the very ones who claim to be its saviors?

Chapter 3: Jerusalém 586 B.C

Centuries pass. She retreats into isolation, turning the vision over in her mind until she convinces herself it was only another angelic trick, a desperate attempt to poison her loyalty. When she finally emerges, a new task awaits. In 586 BC, the archangel Israfil inspired the construction of a grand temple in Jerusalem, a monument to angelic glory. The Devil commands the demons to unite with the Babylonians and strike—destroy the temple, slaughter the angelic forces, and end Israfil.

Glasya arrives at Jerusalem with the Babylonians and a small contingent of demons. The air is tense, heavy with the scent of dust and heat. Then—clear and piercing—the sound of a horn echoes from within the city walls. The moment the note reaches them, paralysis seizes Glasya and the army at her side. For several heartbeats, they stand frozen. Then, from the city gates, an army charges forth—humans at the front, angels among them.

When movement returns, the two forces collide. Glasya weaves through the chaos, refusing to strike the human soldiers, leaving them to the Babylonians. Guardian Angels fall before her blade, then Principalities. Her path leads her to the Temple, where Israfil waits.

The archangel stands with his spear in hand, the Temple rising behind him, a posture of calm superiority—as though Glasya is beneath him. They lock eyes. The fight begins.

Israfil is a dual threat: the horn at his lips unleashes waves of sound sharp enough to stagger her, while his spear keeps her at bay in close combat. His versatility forces her onto the defensive at first, each attack testing her reflexes. But Glasya adapts. She always adapts. Step by step, she closes in, her movements flowing into the deadly rhythm the angels call The Dance of a Demon.

With a sudden shift, she summons her shadows. The Shadow Prison coils around Israfil, binding him in place. In one swift motion, she ends the fight—decapitating the archangel. His body dissolves into white particles, just like the others. Glasya no longer tries to flee from them; she lets them sink into her, though she still does not understand their purpose.

Returning to Hell, she quickly realizes something is wrong. Her powers flare and fade without warning, unstable and dangerous. For a century, she keeps to herself, avoiding other demons to avoid them from discovering the strange energy within her.

At last, the instability fades. For the next eighty-two years, she trains relentlessly, knowing she will face stronger angels in time. She pushes her limits, merging her shadow magic with her signature style. The result is the Dash Attack—a strike so fast it shatters the air itself, faster than sound, designed to counter enemies whose speed once rivaled her own.

Chapter 4: Greece

After one hundred and eighty-two years in Hell, Glasya receives the most difficult assignment of her life up to this point: kill Raphael—one of the three strongest and most influential archangels. The task will take her to Greece, 404 BC, in the midst of the war between Spartans, guided by demons, and Athenians, aided by angels. The battlefield is chaos—thousands of human warriors, demons, and angels clashing in a storm of steel and screams.

Glasya arrives in Sparta, where Belphegor—One of the 9 Archdemons of—waits to lead their army to Athens. But once she steps onto the field, she moves far ahead of him, gliding through the war like a bird through open sky. Hundreds—perhaps thousands—of angels fall before her, Guardian Angels and Principalities alike.

In Athens, she feels him. Raphael's presence is a weight in the air, a pressure that both draws her forward and sets her nerves on edge. His power radiates like heat, forcing her to stay alert.

She walks through the city. Humans scatter before her—some faces lit with hope, as though they see a savior; others twisted with terror, as though a monster has come to destroy them. The fear unsettles her, lingering in her thoughts even as she pushes toward her target.

At last, she finds him. Raphael stands alone, wings dark and featherless, unlike any angel she has met before. More human in form, more grounded—yet his presence is heavier than any she has faced. He does not strike immediately; he speaks. Glasya does not listen. Her instincts warn her, and she attacks.

Their battle shatters the streets. Blades crash, powers collide—every strike could level a mortal army. Raphael fights with full strength, but his expression carries something strange: sorrow. Glasya mistakes it for condescension, rage boiling in her veins. Yet beneath it all, she feels fear—an unfamiliar, unwelcome fear.

The fight drags on for hours, neither able to gain the upper hand. As the sun sinks toward the horizon, Raphael makes a mistake—one that could have been deliberate. Glasya sees it, questions it, but strikes anyway.

As he falls, Raphael breathes, "You poor little creature... so similar to us, and so different. A being lied to since its birth. I—" The words fade. His body dissolves into light. This time, the absorption is different. She feels the power fusing with her own, settling deep within her. Something changes, though she cannot yet name it.

She turns to leave the city. Now every human who sees her wears the same expression—pure fear. The unease gnaws at her as she walks back toward the battlefield. It is empty. Or so she thinks. Belphegor appears suddenly, his blade striking without warning. Glasya reels, shouting in confusion, but instinct drives her to draw her daggers. His eyes blaze with rage and fear. He accuses her of absorbing Raphael, of reeking of angelic power.

She denies it—because she truly does not understand it—but he does not believe her. "I thought we were a team," he roars. "We fought together against those angels—and you were one of them all along. Traitor!"

The betrayal cuts deep. She had trained with him, fought beside him. But his attacks are relentless. She holds back, unwilling to harm him, and suffers for it. Wounds open along her body.

Then, mid-battle, her vision shifts. Belphegor is no longer the imposing, well-dressed figure she knows. Instead, a hulking red beast towers over her, horned and wreathed in fire. The sight shakes her to her core. If this is what he truly is... then what is she?

Her distraction costs her dearly—another brutal wound. She realizes the truth: if she does not kill him, she will die. They fight in earnest. His rage fuels him; her sorrow drags at her strikes. Yet she grows stronger with every battle, and soon she drives him to transform again—this time into a towering, monstrous form, larger and faster than before. His blows are crushing, his speed overwhelming. The only way to survive is to parry, using his own momentum against him.

Once. Twice. Three times she turns his strength back upon him. By the third, he is weakened enough for her to end it. The kill is swift, heavy with guilt. His body returns to its normal form, lying still. She does not absorb him—proof, perhaps, that this only happens with angels.

Back in Hell, demons question her. The soldiers—gleaming armor, white wings, nothing like the monster she fought—ask what happened to Belphegor. She lies. She says Raphael killed him before she could intervene. Her injuries lend weight to the story, and no one doubts her. In truth, they seem almost glad he is gone.

For Glasya, there is no relief. Only the gnawing questions: why does she absorb angels, and why did Belphegor's true form look like that? She searches for answers, but demons keep no books, no archives. In the silence of Hell, she finds nothing.

Chapter 5: Babylon

Glasya never loses hope of finding answers. She has contacts among certain humans—informants whose true loyalties and occupations she does not question. One day, they bring her a name: Azrael, the Fallen Angel of Death. A traitor to Heaven, vanished for centuries. If anyone could answer her questions, it would be him.

Only the Devil needs to know. She tells him an army would alert Azrael and drive him into hiding—that it is better for her to go alone, strike by surprise. The Devil agrees. In 400 BC, she arrives in Babylon. The city stuns her—its vast walls, endless streets, towering structures. Not since Egypt has she seen such a place. But awe will not help her now.

Azrael will be tied to death. She searches for patterns—asking questions, listening to whispers, piecing together sightings. A hooded figure who hides his face. A star engraved on his hand. Always near the dead. Always leaving before dawn. There can be no doubt.

She knows his reputation. The Blade of Death—a weapon said to fell any being that threatens him. One of the finest swordmasters Heaven ever produced. The thought of the fight sharpens her focus.

Near dawn, she finds him. He moves through empty streets toward an open space. As soon as she has a clear view, his voice cuts through the air.

"You can come out, creature. I can feel you." He draws his sword toward her.

There is no point in hiding. She steps into the open and tells him her story—the archangels she has killed, the visions, the strange energy she has absorbed. She does not trust him, but she needs the truth.

He listens. And smiles. The more she speaks, the more interested he becomes. Then he names his price for answers: her body and soul. Her very existence. She refuses. Both take their stances.

For thirty long minutes, they wait—two predators, unmoving. Then Glasya strikes. Daggers meet swords. They match each other blow for blow, every strike parried, every counter deflected. No wounds. No advantage. They are testing each other—holding back their powers, keeping it pure steel against steel.

A break comes when Glasya's blade tears back his hood. Three faces on one head. Wings dark and feathered. He looks less like an angel than a demon—and yet calls himself Heaven's kin.

"You're confused," he says. "I know my appearance is not common. But beyond these faces and my wings, I am like my brothers in Heaven."

It unsettles her. Again, she is forced to question everything—her loyalty, her instincts, even her own nature. But the choice here is simple: she must kill him to leave alive.

The fight changes. Shadows erupt from them both, clashing in twisting bursts. Azrael wields them with more mastery than she has ever seen, but Glasya adapts, fusing her swordcraft with shadow strikes, turning each blow into a physical slash of darkness. Her evolution is constant—Azrael notices it, and fear creeps into his movements.

He knows it is only a matter of time before she overcomes him. And so he makes his choice.

The air thickens. The angels will feel what comes next. Azrael transforms his blade into a massive black scythe—the Scythe of Death itself. Stories flood her mind: one swing could kill any being not essential to the balance of the universe. The power radiating from it tells her the stories are true.

One hit will end her. She shifts to pure defense—dodging, parrying, countering in brief flashes. His style changes with the weapon; every error means death. She waits. She learns. She adapts.

Azrael is already wounded. When the opening comes, it is enough. She strikes, ending him.

His last words:

"Whatever Lucifer did... he made a monster from a piece of himself. You are that monster. And you don't even know what you really are."

Then he is gone—not dissolved into light, but leaving behind the scythe, which fuses into her daggers. Their form does not change, but they turn black, humming with a lethal new edge against angels.

Back in Hell, no one asks where she has been—they felt the spike of angelic power vanish. She spends centuries thinking, connecting threads.

Her creation was different. She appeared before the Devil himself, all the Archdemons present—a rarity. Her growth is unnatural, accelerating after each archangel she kills and absorbs. Belphegor's monstrous form. The shifting way humans look at her.

Azrael's words linger: you don't even know what you're fighting.

She still has no answer. But she will not stop searching.

Chapter 6: Bethlehem

After centuries of waiting, training, and chasing fragments of truth, nothing had changed for Glasya. Her skills had sharpened, but her evolution was minimal, and the answers she sought remained elusive. Then, at last, another order came from the Devil himself: travel alone to Bethlehem, uncover what Metatron was doing there, and kill him.

No army would follow her this time — not even a single demon. The Devil wanted no losses, no noise, and no warning for the angels. Glasya accepted without hesitation.

She arrived in Bethlehem, the year 0 B.C., veiled beneath the guise of a common civilian. Her presence drew no suspicion. She roamed the city's narrow streets, spotting a few Principalities disguised among the people. Those she dispatched silently, their bodies dissolving into the familiar nothingness. Few in number and hard to detect, they were only a distraction from her true target.

Her path eventually led to a small crowd gathered outside a modest home. Curious, she approached, slipping among the onlookers. Inside, a woman labored in childbirth, aided by attentive hands.

Glasya froze. She had never witnessed a human birth before — the beauty of it was alien, the pain visceral. It captivated her, pulled her focus away from her mission entirely.

Then, without a sound or warning, a man appeared beside her. She sensed nothing until he was there. Her daggers were already in hand when he stopped them effortlessly.

It was Metatron.

Handsome, calm, his presence carried a warm, almost human energy. She knew who he was, yet the image didn't match the enemies she had slain before. "Beautiful, isn't it?" he said softly. "This birth is special. That child will be a light to many, a bridge between the divine and the mortal, a guide to a better world."

Glasya sensed no hostility. He seemed to be there not as a warrior, but as a witness, ensuring the child's safe arrival. And somehow, she felt she could not — would not — harm the mother or the infant.

The birth went smoothly. The child cried. And then Glasya remembered why she was there. She turned to leave, knowing Metatron would follow. He did.

They left the city, unspoken understanding between them: Glasya would protect humans from the angels, and Metatron would shield the child from the demons. Whoever died would uphold the other's cause.

Their fight began without a single word. There was no need — they already knew what the other would say.

Metatron, the Scribe of God, wielded his abilities through scripture and spell. His most dangerous tool was a radiant barrier — striking it caused the force to rebound, creating an opening for his counterattack. When she closed the distance, he fought with a feather-turned-dagger, his close combat lacking Azrael's ferocity but bolstered by divine precision.

Glasya's usual speed and fluidity were checked by his layered defenses. She waited, patient, striking only when his barrier fell. Shadows snaked from her movements, binding him in moments of weakness. He countered with spells that cut through the air like spears of light.

The duel was measured, deliberate. Neither yielded ground easily.

Eventually, Glasya adapted. The instant his barrier faltered, she struck, swift and clean. She made the death as painless as possible. "That baby is safe," she said quietly. "I give you my word."

Metatron smiled faintly before his final breath escaped him. White particles lifted from his form, and Glasya let them sink into her as she always did — this time with a strange sense of peace.

She returned to Hell and reported her success, omitting all mention of the child or the nature of her encounter. As she walked through the infernal streets toward her home, no one questioned her. They only lowered their heads in respect.

Inside her human-like dwelling, she entered the bathroom and glanced in the mirror. Her reflection froze her in place.

Horns.

She had never borne them before. She hadn't felt them grow. No one had said a word. For a moment, she wondered if it was only her eyes that could see them. Regardless, she decided they would remain hidden. For now.

Chapter 7: Pompeii

Glasya had endured much, but this time she could not simply march forward without pause. In the quiet after so many battles, she was left with the tangle of unanswered questions Azrael had planted in her mind. She still didn't know who she was truly fighting... or who she truly was.

She had begun piecing together fragments: she was not made like the other demons — The Devil had made her differently — and that difference was tied to the strange compulsion to absorb angels. Yet beyond those connections, mysteries persisted. Why had Belphegor's appearance changed? Where had her horns come from? Why had the warm greetings she once received turned to fear?

One truth, however, had become unshakable: she could never thrust the demons as she once had. Whatever was happening to her, it had to remain a secret, hidden from as many eyes as possible.

Nearly eighty years passed in Hell's unrelenting flow of time — for Glasya, an instant. She returned to the human world, not for war, but for release. She roamed, leaping and gliding across the earth with her shadow powers, tracing mountain ridges and city skylines.

Then it struck her — faint at first, then steadily swelling. A familiar current of angelic energy. Stronger with each step, and uncomfortably akin to Azrael's.

Another fallen angel. There could be only one: Abbadon, the fallen angel of Destruction.

Glasya felt the same pull as always — a strange, irresistible force that drove her toward angels, to end them. She followed the trail to a volcano, where Abbadon stood upon its peak, hands pressed to the earth, coaxing it toward eruption. The nearby cities would never survive.

She didn't hesitate. She launched herself upward, shadows curling beneath her, and struck him with a fierce kick. Abbadon reeled, more startled than hurt, quickly shifting into a stance — fists only, but bowling with hate and murderous intent.

They clashed in brutal close quarters. Glasya's strikes were fluid and precise, but when she began to push him back, Abbadon unleashed his void magic, slamming his fists into the volcanic rock. The ground split and sank, forcing both of them to leap away as molten chaos erupted beneath them. Lava poured from the wound in the mountain; stones, glowing red, rained from above.

There was no time to think. She hunted for Abbadon through the smoke and glare, finding him amid the shifting haze. This time, his void-charged fists struck with annihilating force. The fight grew harsher, the air around them trembling — until a sudden column of light tore down from the heavens.

From it stepped Salatiel, an archangel, his eyes cold and calculating. Few words passed between him and Abbadon — enough to bind them together for one purpose: destroy Glasya.

Two powerful enemies now moved in perfect, brotherly sync. The pressure was immense, their rhythm almost impossible to read. But Glasya had faced worse. She adapted. With her smooth slashes and accurate magic abilities, she finished Abbadon first, breaking him down until he could fight no more, and as he fell, she began absorbing him in plain view of Salatiel.

Something shifted in Abbadon's form during the absorption — a strange duality overtaking him. One half remained the light red she had seen before, clad in fierce, ragged armor; the other was draped in a flawless white suit, handsome and composed, his wings whole and feathered. That white half bore an unsettling resemblance to The Devil himself, and it froze Glasya for just an instant.

But hesitation was not in her nature. Salatiel's magic forced her back again and again, waves of energy pushing her away, yet he lacked the resilience to withstand her shadow magic once it caught him. A single stun, and her blade was through his chest. Salatiel fell. She absorbed him too. Only later would she realize something within her had changed.

She returned to Hell, where the air was already thick with whispers — every demon had felt the angelic energy from her battle. But no one approached. No questions were asked. And Glasya preferred it that way.

Chapter 8: Mecca

631 Earth-years have passed and per usual she feels like nothing for Glasya, she used all this time she had to just think and do some slight training in her skills, honing her recently absorbed ability, void magic, enhancing the strength of her attacks considerably. Glasya stayed in isolation for that whole period of time so she had zero contact with any demon of any type.

After all that time Glasya received a message for her to head to Mecca with a big army and deal with Gabriel, the second strongest Archangel of all of them. Glasya headed to Mecca her own way, she decided to stay away from the demons as much as she could, but at some point interaction was inevitable. So as she approached Mecca she had to join forces with the demons.

Glasya was shocked by the sight in front of her the army that once was as beautiful as the sunset now is even more hideous than a storm. The army consisted of beautiful white feathered creatures and good appearance now they all look like featherless red monsters with horns just like Belphegor looked like, just like the monsters in the vision destroying the Earth realm.

Even though Glasya is disgusted by the army she is fighting alongside with, something stops her from avoiding the fight, it is almost like something or even someone is drawing her into that, something wants her to kill Gabriel, this same "feeling" wanted her to kill all the other archangels, and she could never stop it.

As per usual Glasya does not dare to hit a single human and focuses only on the angels cutting them as swiftly as possible with deadly precision. As time passes it is as if the angels are only getting weaker as they stand against Glasya, but Glasya is the one getting astonishingly strong.

After just a few moments passed and Glasya was already halfway through the army and Gabriel, it did not take long until she got to Gabriel once and for all. Once she arrived next to Gabriel he attacked, he was enraged because of her having killed all of his brothers.

The fight was very level headed. Both of them are very skilled and Gabriel as one of the strongest Archangels only behind Michael makes the fight very complicated for Glasya, but nothing is ever too big of a problem to her. She adapted to his fighting pattern, switching back and forth between using magic with his clarinet and using the clarinet as a rapier.

The fight took quite a bit of the time to come to an end both of them were dealing considerable damage to each other, but once Gabriel reached a critical point he released his strongest magic a wave of sound magic that covered the whole area damaging Glasya greatly as well, she was not was not able to heal herself at that moment so she pushed forward and after trading blows and magic with Gabriel she finished him, she completely severed his head and as his head touched the ground he was already being absorbed by her.

This time there was no vision or no visible changes to her mentally or physically so unworried about it she left the battlefield and headed once again to Hell. Back at her house in Hell she noticed something terrifying about herself, something that she could never imagine in a million years, something that even the Devil would be terrified at the sight of. Glasya was irrecognizable well at least half of her isn't, now she is divided in 2 sides as if she is 2 different people, now her appearance is half of what she was already, so one of the halves is a gorgeous woman with a white suit, and the other half of her is of a red monstrosity with foul skin, horrible appearance and a single horn.

Now Glasya does not know what to think. She is now half of what she has fought her whole life and half what she always was. or thought she was at least, she now resembles even Belphegor when they fought each other, multiple thoughts crossed her mind but she could not make sense of any of them. For now she would just rest and think about what to do and what has happened.

Chapter 9: Jerusalém 1099 A.D

Centuries have passed and Glasya did not dare to leave her house, she did not know if her appearance was visible only for her or for anyone in Hell. It is now 1099 A.D Glasya has no idea what has happened outside all of these years in the human realm and she did not want to go out there and find out until she figured out how to go back to normal.

Glasya had no choice though the Devil summoned her, on the way to his chambers no demons reacted to Glasya's appearance so she made no big deal about it and kept going to the Devil's war room. There he gave her a new mission, she was expected to head once again to Jerusalem but this time instead of invading the city she needed to help the humans and the demon army to protect the city from the enemy army being led by the angel army.

Already at the city the fight had started already and per usual Glasya avoided fighting humans and focused only on the angels headed towards the city, Glasya was basically stationed at one point the whole time just eliminating some weaker angels waiting for an Archangel to show up. It was not long until Glasya had eliminated hundreds of angels and Uriel appeared out of the sky descending upon the battlefield on the outskirts of the city as if he was calling her there.

Not being able to resist that obvious taunt she rushed after him leaving the city behind. Now close to him Glasya was able to take a good look at him and noticed something bizarre, both of them were "divided" in half, both of them had one side that was more gorgeous and clean with a white suit, while the other side is more scary with a destroyed dark suit and a single horn. That played even bigger mind games to Glasya she had no idea what was actually happening, but at that moment she was sure of one thing: that she had to kill Uriel.

The fight was intense. Uriel was smart and strong, but Glasya was used to fighting stronger enemies, her previous one Gabriel was a lot stronger, but that does not mean Uriel was weak. The fight took longer than expected. Uriel was always trying to push away from Glasya and use his fire magic to get distance and attack her.

He kept that strategy the whole time even when he reached critical health he stayed distant and summoned a fire aura around him that could be expanded occasionally that damaged Glasya over time if she was inside that aura. Glasya did not stop pushing forward, she kept attacking and he kept backing up, but at some point Uriel could not keep up anymore and Glasya took the chance and finished him once and for all, she started absorbing him instantly.

Glasya, done with the fight, glanced back at the city the demons were protecting and she noticed that the city had been taken by the Latin Church with the crusaders and the angels. Seeing that made her notice why Uriel did all that he did to buy time for his army to win over the city. Now with nothing to do Glasya decided to head back to Hell where The Devil was waiting for her to give an explanation to how they lost the city, she explained but he did not care he was furious and dismissed her.

Going back to her house Glasya did not see any demons in Hell, she knew it was because they lost a lot of troops during this last fight against the angels. Now back at her house she was able to take a deep breath, look in the mirror and hope the nightmare was done, but little did she know it only had gotten worse, now she looked fully like her ugly side, her whole body was red, she had these 2 disgusting horns and long nails, she now looked like a monster, like the monsters she has been fighting this whole time against.

All she could think was that absorbing the angels was making her polluted, turning her into one of them progressively as she absorbed each one of them. She knew there was nothing for her to do about any of this, just hope once she kills all the angels she will be cured or if not she could try and ask help from the Devil. But for now she knew she had to practice her abilities because the last Archangel, Michael, was the strongest one of all of them and she would have to use all of her power to win against him.

Chapter 10: Vatican City

After more centuries passed in the human realm, Glasya had mastered all her abilities and learnt new ones from absorbing the archangels; she felt ready to kill the last Archangel once and for all. It was now 1928 societies had advanced tremendously there was already a huge war called World War 1 that the angels and demons were a part of, but Glasya was not used for that war, The Devil was saving her for the moment he needed her for. He was waiting for Michael to appear.

And that moment had arrived The Devil urgently called Glasya and told her of the location of Michael, he was currently at the current Vatican City State in Italy. The Devil was clear with his instructions she would lead a small battalion of demons and invade the city, find Michael and kill him.

Infiltrating the city was easy. The problem was moving around inside the city, Michael's army was spread everywhere and just from the feels and looks of it she knew they were a lot stronger than the other armies she had fought all this time. After finding out that Michael was at the highest point of the city on the Saint Peter's square, after finding that out Glasya decided to stop hiding and rushed head on to the Square, which was right next to the Basilica.

She killed multiple angels, all very strong; the demons she had brought with her were slayed quite quickly by them, but for her those angels were no problem, Glasya kept pushing forward and headed towards the Basilica. Once by the Basilica there were no angels there protecting it, she knew that Michael figured that they would be of no match to her and was just waiting for her on the other side of the Building.

As she ventured through the building she saw a lot of art works and most if not all of them were representations of Jesus Christ she did not have to know the name of that person she just knew who he was, she knew that man was the baby she saw being born thousands of years ago and now she knows what happened to him, he is now famous and a miracle maker he is a symbol of hope for humans that made her happier than ever she knows that this one thing she did of just watching that kid being born resulted in him being this special to the beings she cherishes the most, humans.

All of that was only able to distract her for seconds, once she snapped back to reality she directed herself again to the courtyard where Michael was waiting for her. As she approached the courtyard, big windows were on the way and she saw Michael, he was just there in the middle of the courtyard just looking up to the sky as if something was there waiting for him. He was angelic with a gorgeous face, big white feathered wings and a gorgeous white suit, and specially no horns.

The second Glasya stepped foot on the courtyard Michael turned in her direction, his expression was neutral. He then started walking in her direction and she readied herself, but noticed he had no intentions of fighting at least not right now. She sheathed her weapons and started walking towards him, once both of them were 5 ft away from each other and Michael started talking.

He started just telling her a story the story of his father and how great he was and how he created all life in this planet, and how he created the angels to protect it in the beginning they were 12 archangels but now they are only 9, in which 2 of them are fallen angels and the last one the first to rebel and considered the strongest of all of them Lucifer, or now known as The Devil, after rebelling against God he was banished to Hell and turned himself into The Devil.

Glasya had no words to say so she just kept listening to him talk, Michael kept going with the story, after Lucifer was banished to Hell he started to create himself an army an army of demons, monsters that would kill all the creations of God including both humans and angels, Glasya was petrified by those words she thought she was fighting for the greater good, for humanity as a hero, but now she knows the truth at least some of it she knows what she actually is, she knows what she has been fighting for all this time and she knows that her current appearance is her real self, but one question still lingers how can she absorb other angels and change appearances? That was a question not even Michael had an answer all he could say is that now after absorbing all his brothers she is a mix of a demon and an angel.

After this whole conversation both of them regretted it but they had to fight not by choice but for need, Michael had to kill her to avenge his brothers and protect humanity from her, and Glasya still did not know why she had to fight but she just had to, she knew deep within herself she had to fight him and eliminate him once and for all like she did with all his brothers. They both took some steps back to get some distance, Glasya unsheathed her daggers and Michael summoned his Flaming Sword made from the branches of the Tree of Life, the fight was inevitable so they both rushed at each other for one last fight.

Once the daggers and sword clashed for the first time a huge wave pushed both of them backwards, both of their strengths were on par, they were both immensely strong. But that did not stop either one of them, they kept pushing forward at each other, Glasya used all that she had, she used all her shadow abilities, all the knowledge she had in combat and all the powers she absorbed from the angels. Michael was also using all his power, he was using all the abilities the Flaming Sword had within itself, like vines created out of the sword and fire attacks, Michael also used the Shield of Justice capable of reflecting any attacks directed to him if blocked by the shield making the fight harder for Glasya.

Both of them were attacking, defending, parrying, retreating, analyzing and adapting to their enemy. After almost 30 minutes of fight they were both quite injured, not that those injuries were going to stop any of them, Michael reaching that point he flies up to the sky and starts chanting in latin. Glasya notices it rushes after him but she is not fast enough he finishes chanting and rays of light push her back to the ground. As she reached the ground, Michael starts descending and as he descends behind him a gigantic tree starts appearing from high up the sky all the way down to the ground, Michael did not have to say what that was Glasya felt it deep within herself that was the Tree of Life not in its fullest but a summon of its greatness.

After summoning the Tree Michael attached himself to it and completely healed himself. That was a surprise to Glasya but that fight was not even close to being over. The fight after his transformation was a lot more complicated now than it was before, Michael fighting as The Tree of Life had immense range, quick attack rate and the ability to use multiple different types of magic while having physical attacks was a lot to take on, and that was not even all, on top of all that occasionally the Shield of Justice activated its impenetrable defenses forcing Glasya to focus completely on dodging, blocking and attacking. That was so annoying for her even though her fighting style, the Dance Of A Demon, depended a lot on dodging and quick reflexes; only doing that was the thing Glasya hated the most.

As the fight progressed Glasya was getting more and more pissed with Michael's fighting style, that was making her blood boil with hatred towards him, she was being able to deal damage to him and avoid most of the attacks directed to her but that was going to end badly for her if it kept going. She had to find within herself more power, she had to find her truth, she had to find what actually drives her to win this fight. Then she noticed, she noticed the most obvious thing about her, a thing she never knew the truth about, what she really was, but now she does at least a little bit she now knows what she is essentially, she is a demon, she was created like that and she needs to embrace it.

The second she accepts that fate, she accepts herself and her nature, even though she hates it she accepts it as what she is, and accepting it was the trigger. It all happened so quickly that Glasya almost did not notice it, she only knew because of the power she felt flowing through her body, she was now a fully fledged demon she had awakened a power deep inside her that lets her temporarily go deep into her demon assassin nature, in this form her horns grew larger, she now had disgusting ginormous wings.

Power was flowing through her veins, a power she could never imagine that she would have, a power she could never imagine would look like that, a power she could never imagine that would be part of her. She knew that power would not last forever so she pushed forward at Michael, their fight was crazy, the amount of power both of them were able to use and control was insane, every single creature could feel them.

They traded multiple blows, a mix of both physical and magic attacks, they were both overdoing it, but none of them seemed to know it, the damage each one of them was dealing to another was too much for both of them to take, and both of them de-transformed at the same time, Michael was back to his angel body and Glasya is now back to her normal fully demonic body. Both of them were tired and damaged. They overdid themselves so much that they cannot even use magic right now, that was not going to stop neither of them from killing the other one.

Glasya rushed at him, she did not feel hate towards him she was almost happy in a way, but mad in another, she had never fought like this or found out much about herself at the same time so that was enjoyable for her, but she is mad about her nature and about how she was supposedly deceived her whole life by The Devil if Michael did not lie to her, but something is stopping her from hating

The Devil, that same something is stopping her from wanting to kill him, right now all she can think of killing is Michael that is right in front of her ready to lunge at her with the flaming sword the only thing he is able to carry right now considering how exhausted he is.

When Michael lunges at Glasya, she does the same, they both collided sword and daggers in a quick clash of attacks, those attacks gave both of them the feeling that those would be the last hits they were going to strike at each other, the end of the battle was approaching and they both knew it. As they attacked each other their attacks only got slower and the damage they were dealing to each other was only increasing.

It was not long until Michael, in all his damage and tiredness, left a single breach in his defense which Glasya took advantage of to finish Michael once and for all. Glasya stabbed him in the heart and as he was falling onto his knees to his death he whispered to Glasya "Be Free" in latin, then he started fading away into the usual white particles, only this time those particles were a lot brighter and stronger than ever.

As she absorbed it visions started to appear, the first of the visions was of the beginning of all 13 archangel brothers right after being created and Lucifer was there, the second vision was of Lucifer getting kicked out of Heaven and sent to Hell where he changes into the monster she knows, the last vision was of when she was created, when Lucifer created her he made her in the image of himself using his angel spirit and abilities to make the perfect mix of a demon in essence and an archangel in power, but there was a problem he noticed she was too pure the angel part of her was making her too soft he knew she was not the weapon he needed to kill all the archangels so he changed her, he set her under a spell, a spell so powerful that changed how she sees her world a spell that made her think she was one of the good guys, a spell so powerful that everything she saw was not real, a spell so powerful that the only thing she could do is perceive and kill archangels, and going against that, going against that spell would be impossible. Or so Lucifer thought, by absorbing the archangels the spell was losing effectiveness and now after killing all the Archangels she was free, free to see the truth and think on her own.

After seeing all that and figuring out she is free from that spell, she set her mind straight on a single thing, she set her mind on the objective of killing The Devil, she wants to eliminate the monster that controlled her, lied to her and created her. She knew it would be tough, a lot tougher than ever but that never stopped her and will not stop now. And like this Glasya left the Vatican where the city of the popes would be created there, all around the tree created in the same exact location where Michael died, a tree created by his essence and the essence of the Flaming Sword.

Chapter 666: Hell

Glasya upon arriving in Hell finds herself surrounded by Demons of every single power level, she advances thought this battlefield where low ranked demons and Archdemons charge at her, she swiftly kills all of them after eliminating every single demon she proceeds to the room where it all started the war room, where The Devil created all the Archdemons and herself, and it is going to be where Glasya will execute her revenge once and for all, and after finishing him she will pay for all her sins and end her life ending with the existence of all the creations of The Devil, all that she will be the doing for herself, for the first time in her life she will do it for her and herself only.

As Glasya was approaching the war room her nerves were running through the roof, something she never felt before it was a sensation of fighting a higher being something in another level, she did not know if she was ready for it, all she knew was that she was going to fight and her only choice was to win that fight. As she entered the war room Lucifer was in there waiting for her, he knew that she was coming and that none of the demons were going to be able to stop her. He did not say a word he already knew everything, but Glasya had a lot to say, she said everything she found out through all these centuries and how he lied to her all this time and how he made her a monster, and how in the end he is the monster as well.

She just kept on saying things to him and when she was done, she pulled her daggers once and for all, and said "It is time to finish this Lucifer", Lucifer upon hearing this felt hate run his veins he hates that name more than anything, "Don't you ever call me that again demon". Lucifer pulled out a sword, a substitute to the Flaming Sword that used to belong to him as an archangel.

The fight barely started and Lucifer changed the room they are fighting in, the war room transformed into a lava arena, an arena designed for them to fight with no distractions, no limited space with the sole purpose of being the space they will be killing each other. The fight started in the beginning they were both fighting on the same level, they were trading blows and landing a few hits on each other nothing that was enough to deal any serious damage, but after some minutes of that, Lucifer got tired of faking it and said "Well for killing all the archangels I thought you would be stronger, I think it is time to take this a bit more serious.", Lucifer then starts fighting for real his speed, power and combat ability are in another level.

Glasya seeing this power out of her scale made her panic for a second, but this was not the first time she had to deal with someone stronger than her, all she had to do was adapt. And that was what she did. She started observing Lucifer, how he moves, how he fights and she learnt, she learnt how to fight against him, she decided to step up her game too and activated her full demonic form against him, she unleashed her power and was fighting head to head against him. She dealt a lot of damage to him in that form, but once again he said "Is that all I gave you part of me and that's all you can do? Really?! It is time to end this.". As he said that he transformed.

Lucifer now is in his archangel form his true form, the form he hates the most in this whole world, but the form he was always the strongest, but that was something off with his form even all the usual features the other archangels had, like being pretty, feathered wings and the white suit, Lucifer had in addition to all that horns and a third wing, that third wing tho was the same one as his demonic form, grotesque and featherless. After transforming into this monster mixed with an angel, Glasya was taking too much damage, Lucifer was combining too many magic spells and physical attacks, she was overpowered, but what she had to reach for was inside her the whole time.

As Glasya was being overpowered all she could think of was all the angels she had killed, she thought of Jeliel, Cassiel, Israfil, Raphael, Azrael, Metatron, Salatiel, Abbadon, Gabriel, Uriel and specially Michael, she remembered his last words "Be free", she did not feel like that right now all she thought was that she was done for. And then she remembered what some of them said, she did not know what she was, she did not know her essence, but now she does, she is part angel and part demon. That was the trigger she needed, remembering what she really is, once she understood that once and for all she unlocked her true self, what she thinks she is, a half-demon half-angel, and that is what she transformed into, she is now two halves that mix perfectly into each other, she still has horns but not grotesque horns she liked those, her skin was a tone of brown and she felt it, all of it, all the power that body had and all the suffering had to go through to be like that.

Now the fight was more balanced Lucifer still had the upper hand, but Glasya was not that far behind. Their blows were so strong at each other that reality itself started to change, both of them started changing, transforming into their other forms, sometimes being demons, sometimes being angels, sometimes being both, and sometimes just being themselves. That did not stop either of them, they both kept trading blows, because their lives were on the line, both of their desires for revenge were on the line, their purpose was on the line and it all depended on the outcome of this one fight.

Glasya was giving it her all, she did not care anymore into what she turned into due to their different attacks at each other, she had accepted within herself what she was and she knew what she had to do. While Lucifer hated changing as much as they did, he hated his angel form, but he hated even more remembering that he is The Devil, that reminded him of being exiled by his own father and hated by his own brothers, that was the destiny he always hated. That hatred, that blindness, that distraction was all that Glasya needed to deal some serious damage to Lucifer, she was even able to make a clean cut all the way though his neck decapitating him.

Or that is what she thought she knew she had the clean cut, she knew that his head should be on the floor, but she did not hear any thumping sounds, and as she looked back at Lucifer he was fine as if this whole fight never happened he was still in his angel form and without a single scratch on his body. Glasya was surprised by that, she did not know how that could be, that slash should have killed him once and for all, seeing that she stepped back, tripped and fell.

Lucifer noticed the despair and started explaining that there's no point in trying to kill him, because at this point he was already a part of the natural process of existence in general. He explained that there's a need for balance between light and dark, good and evil. So just like God is immortal, The Devil is also immortal, even though he is a creation of God, after eons of existing as this contrary force of God's nature, Lucifer became necessary for balancing life. Lucifer also clarified his wish of killing all the angels as a way of hurting God's ego by killing his "perfect" creatures, and used Glasya just as a tool to do it. After he reveals everything, Glasya had no more strengths within her, she had used all of it but for nothing, it was all pointless in her head, she was always just a tool and until the very ending she was never able to finish anything for herself. Glasya with tears in her eyes took her last breath as Lucifer stabbed her chest with his sword, and just like the other angels she just vanished into thin air, turning into white particles absorbed by the being she hated the most, The Devil. All that was left of her were her daggers and an unpleasant memory in the world of her murderous acts, even if those were not her intentions.
